Thomann-Harry

Thomann-Harry is an exterior building, cleaning and restoration company which uses specialist, patented, access equipment and systems, eliminating the need for scaffolding.

All of the company plant and vehicles (some bespoke to them) are consistent in their professional branding and scrupulous cleanliness and appearance, matched by a workforce wearing custom-made, branded kit, uniforms and PPE.

As well as projecting a superb image, the company has developed a system of working which minimises the impact of building and cleaning works in busy or strategic locations, allowing the public to go unhindered about their daily business.

In terms of the environment, the company's impressive work procedures create zero levels of pollution, with 100% recycling and reuse of materials. The company has installed and developed a mobile treatment plant at the works to separate particles from waste water for reuse – an outstanding achievement for any company.

With similarly robust approaches taken towards safety and the workforce, demonstrated by an "infectious" team spirit and close bond between the management and workers, this company was described by the Scheme Monitor as "one of the most considerate employers I've met".

Summing up Thomann-Harry's hugely considerate ethos, he added: "There are no other examples in the industry to compare this company with. They present themselves to an exceptional standard that reaffirms them as a progressive forward-thinking company who, through innovation, research and development, find solutions to meet the needs of their clients."
